I know that I can check if a string is null with isinstance(x,str) or if x is None: but is it possible to test that a string is NOT null, as I often see it in old code? In my case, the function given to me takes a string, and it makes no sense to give it a null string and get an error. Thanks A: From the docs: isinstance(a, b) Called to check if an object is of the type a. a must be a type or a class. a must be a type or a class that inherits from object. If a is a tuple, it must be a tuple of length 1 or 2. If a is a tuple of length 2, the types of the two elements must be the same. Note that isinstance() compares type and value, not just value. So, to get rid of a NoneType you could do something like this: >>> import sys >>> from typing import Any >>> any(isinstance(x,str) for x in (None, '', sys.maxint, None, sys.maxint, [], ca3bfb1094
