Reconsideration of Medicaid reimbursement policies may reduce access to health services and cause nonpatient access delay. To determine Medicaid reimbursement policy targets and delays and to estimate the effect of reimbursement policies on patient access delay, we linked 2011 Medicaid Discharge Abstracts data and a Medicare enrollment file in two states. We used multivariate logistic regression to determine the proportion of Medicaid enrollees with nonpatient access delay. Using a regression discontinuity design, we estimated the effects of Medicaid reimbursement policy changes over the 2003-2011 period. Medicaid reimbursed providers on the basis of per-visit, per-capita, and per-beneficiary fees. We compared cases with prereimbursement nonpatient access delay (access delays in excess of 3 days) with those whose access delays were shorter than 3 days. The rate of nonpatient access delay in our sample was lower in early than in late years of the study period. States where the target for reimbursement shifted from per-visit to per-beneficiary fees had higher rates of nonpatient access delay. A change in Medicaid reimbursement policy may increase nonpatient access delay in states that focus Medicaid resources primarily on beneficiaries. States can reduce access delay by requiring Medicaid reimbursement
