It's likely to heat up again as the governor brings his proposal for the General Assembly. But even before that, it's possible that the state will create its own board to oversee the state's employee retirement system and develop new rules. That could lead to it having a conflict of interest. A board in which the state employee unions have board members has a direct impact on the rate of benefit increases. As U.S. workers face stiff competition from low-wage workers in other countries and from many workers in their own states, unions say benefits for workers should be affordable and flexible, including allowing them to work as many years as they want, but without jeopardizing their benefits. Those benefits have to be designed in a way that keeps the state's budget in balance. "This is a noncontroversial proposal," said Terry O'Neill, head of the American Civil Liberties Union of Tennessee. "We're not talking about restricting benefits, we're talking about expanding benefits for public-sector workers." The governor's proposal does not restrict benefits from being taken out of the system. In his 2011 budget, Mr. Haslam proposed raising the pension contributions from members at least partly so that they would meet state matching contributions. The size of that increase, for regular workers, was scheduled to be about 20 percent. The governor's proposal seeks to increase the contribution by 25 percent for people who became state employees after July 1, 2013. At that point, workers would contribute 12 percent of their salary for state and their employer would contribute 4 percent. The governor's proposal would freeze the employer contribution for those who became state employees before then. To
